In general, a conventional fan blade system includes a central hub, two fan blades, and an annular impeller located between the two fan blades. The impeller includes an outer ring and an inner ring. Each of the two fan blades has a radial rim and a plurality of blades which extend from the radial rim. Each blade has an opposite first end which is coupled to the central hub and a second end opposite to the first end. Each blade is oriented in a substantially radial direction. As shown in FIG. 5, each blade 10 includes an air hole 11 and a number of spikes 12. Each spike 12 extends from the second end of the blade 10 and may be integrally formed with the blade 10 or may be integrally formed with the outer ring of the impeller. The spikes 12 may be arranged in a circular fashion or in an annular fashion. A gap 15 exists between the air hole 11 and the spike 12. In operation, the impeller receives an electric current from a power source and drives the two fan blades. As a result, a radial air flow is created, which causes the central hub to rotate and consequently forces the two fan blades to rotate. A direction of rotation of the two fan blades is opposite to that of the central hub. The blades 10 are in direct contact with the inner wall of the air gap 15. As a result, heat generated from the two fan blades 10 is transferred to the inner wall of the air gap 15 and then expelled via the air holes 11. However, the inner wall of the air gap 15 still suffers from a substantial temperature rise. In order to improve the efficiency of the heat-dissipating fan, a blade system has been proposed. The blade system includes an additional blade plate in order to improve the efficiency of the overall heat-dissipating fan. A blade system for improving the efficiency of the overall heat-dissipating fan, as disclosed in Taiwan Patent Publication No. 398837, includes a central hub, two fan blades, and an impeller located between the two fan blades. Each of the two fan blades has a radial rim, a number of
